COMEDIAN'S CHILD, AGED SEVEN, PLAYS ALL OF HIS PARTS

Little Miss Stone Is Bandit, Clown, and Scarecrow by Turns.

NEW YORK, Dec. 25.—As your car hurries through West Ninety-third street from Central Park West a small but terrible figure launches itself at you from the sidewalk. Sombrero, you from the sidewalk. Sombrero, bristling mustache and shotgun do their desperate best to convince you of your imminent peril. But look for a bunch of yellow curls under the stouch hat. You will probably find them, and then you will know that the dangerous "summan" is merely Miss Allene Dorothy Stone, "playing paps."
Derothy is the seven-year-old daughter of Fred Stone, the famous comedian, and at present she is doing her level best to make herself into a Fred Stone No. 2. Never a costume is constructed for paps to wear on Broadway but it must be duplicated for daughter. She always helps her father to study the always helps her father to study his parts and not only observes his "business" but criticises it. And every Baturday she dons the rig for one of the Stone characters and flatly refused to answer to any other name than that of the character during the entire day. Approves of Highway Part.

The highwayman's costume is a special favorite. For a mustache she uses a long, narrow "rat" which was once the property of her mother, the ends of which she ties over her ears. with a tiny pair of riding breeches, a battered sombrero considerably too large for her and a toy shotgun, she is comfortably convinced that "Gyp the Blood" has nothing on her.

When she is on the big farm at Amity-ville, Long Island, where the Stones spend their summers, she prefers the Fole of "Pedro," which belonged to Mr. Stone in "The Old Town." This "dresses" with a sort of a farmer-cowboy fences, tramping through underbrush and riding the pony. It is varied now and then by a "scarecrow" makeup like hat worn by Fred Stone in Visard of Oz."

Miss Dorothy Original.

But little Miss Dorothy is nothing if not original. While she is the best olium in the world with her father and delighted to follow close on the trail of his histrionic career, her artistic temperament demands even bolder expression. So she makes up parts and even whole plays for herself. There is a convenient cupboard full of cast-off stage finery and including a large stock of wigs and beards, to which Dorothy of wigs and beards, to which Dorothy has unhindered access. She doesn't meglect her opportunity and her "soting range" is truly catholic. One day she is a princess, another a scrub-lady, again a grinning country youngster or a circus performer.
On only one point is Dorothy's mother Srm. She will not allow the little girl to smear rouge over her naturally rony cheeks, or to blacken her long, curling cyclashes. So Dorothy "makes up" her nurse.

She Is "Writing Maker." Perhaps some day she will write her wn musical comedy, as well as act in bwn musical comedy, as well as act in it. She has a charming little voice, and is yery fond of music, and she is also a poet or a "writing-maker," to use of her lyrics, some of them illustrated with pictures cut from magazines, others with sketches made by the poet berself.

"The swans are in the water." Looking for their daughter." The pupples love their mother as soon as she comes near."

"The dear little dove Is just full of love." "See the little rabbits!
They have very bad habits." "That brush is pulling my hair Right up in the air!" Makes Up Her Playmates.

Dorothy doesn't act her play-dramas and has had few playmates. But she makes up her playfellows, just as she makes up her plays. She carries on long dialogues with wholly imaginary "shadow children," for whom she has her own names and descriptions, "Can't you see them, mamma?" she asks, wonderingly. "Why, they're just as plain!"
"No," declares Fred Stone, "that child isn't going on the stage. She's going to have a good education and study music. But no stage for hers!"
"Don't you think," laughs Dorothy's mother, "that Dorothy will have something to say about that?"
And blue-eyed, golden-curled Dorothy, poet, playwright, actress, singer and stage manager, surely believes that she will have something to say when the time comes.
